Dear Professor Lederberg:

I am very happy that you are interested in my paper on the "Thirteen Critical Points of Contemporary Economic Theory" and I am enclosing a reprint. If you have any comments, I shall be very grateful for them. Unfortunately, I did not deal with the question which seems to interest you most, namely, the production of wants. I agree with you that this is a very serious matter, both for theory as well as for practical politics.

I was particularly interested in the enclosure of your testimony before the Subcommittee on Public Health. I am at present trying to get a number of persons together who will write down on just one to two pages at most the chain that leads from a fundamental basic scientific discovery to various unexpected practical applications. I have received such statements from NASA. Some friends of mine in physics doing similar things, e.g., the derivation of the transistor from solid state physics etc. I wonder whether you would be willing to send me a similar statement regarding some important medical matters. The reason for all this is that we want to present these documents, which are to be in a simple manner so that a comparative layman, that is to say, a high government official can actually understand them and see their significance. I am greatly disturbed about the reduction in support and continuing support of basic sciences in this country. I want to go with these documents to Secretary Shultz who is a former student of mine and with whom I can talk frankly. I have already discussed these things quite openly with Mr. Ash, the head of the Office of Management and Budget. Of course, the Watergate case paralyzes the whole government and one may have to wait until things have gotten into some shape again. Nevertheless, the effort must be made and I hope you will be good enough to support me.

With best regards.

Very sincerely yours,
